

In my career, I have been asked many questions about people and the choices they make in life. How can a person choose to harm themselves because they are in pain? how can a parent harm their child? How can complete strangers look at an innocent child and judge her as damaged, and worthless because of the actions of others? Sure I have a formal education and professional answers for these questions, but what I know for certain is how it happened in my own life. My own words contained in these pages answer those questions applied not to the masses but to me. This story is how I went from being an innocent, brave and faithful child in an abusive home, to a throw-away teen bounced from home to home and losing all hope in people, to an outwardly successful college student with dirty secrets of her past and the razor blade in her bathroom, and finally a healthy adult who is guiding others on their healing journey. I cannot claim this as fact, nor will I pretend that it is fiction. It is simply my experiences as I know them, told by me. This story is in remembrance to those who hurt me, and the love I had for many of them, in honor those who assisted me out of the situation I was born into and later those that I got myself into, and most of all to give a voice to the words I used to be afraid to speak in hopes others will no longer feel alone.
